I believe there should be no governmental action of any kind against Microsoft.

I have used a wide variety of Microsoft software and hardware since 1992. For the moderate amounts of money these items cost, I have received immense value. These products have made computing and use of the internet much more efficient and enjoyable.

Instead of penalizing Microsoft, the U.S. Government and the American people should praise Microsoft for its many innovations, which have greatly improved American productivity and provided thousands of good high-tech jobs for Americans.

The anti-trust case against Microsoft is ludicrous - to prove an anti-trust violation, the government must prove harm to consumers, and it has failed to do so. From personal experience, I know of no such harm. Besides, anyone who does not like Microsoft has always been free to buy Apple products.

Thank you for your attention to my views.

Sincerely,

Harry E. B. Sullivan
